A New Home for Beyond the Horizons Consulting

Dear Readership:

This month we will digress a bit from our usual themes of “therapy for business” to share some thoughts and pictures of our “new home” here at Beyond the Horizons Consulting.

Last October we finally decided that it was time to create a studio/casita to serve as home to our seminars. We needed a place for the creative juices to flow. We needed an atmosphere conducive to preparing our workshops and engaging in our writing projects, and also a serene place to offer these seminars to small groups of persons interested in professional and personal growth.

We contracted for our casita/studio to be built off-site and to be delivered by tractor trailer. The plan was to have a finished foundation on which it would be set after completion of the actual building.

Work began around November 2004. We will comment on the progress by way of sharing with you a number of photos, taken by our Business Manager, Stan Bochenski, who is also a published photographer.

Our first photo shows the foundation nearing completion last Christmas (2004). And yes, we do have snow in Santa Fe! Last winter we had an unusually high number of “snow days” and record snowfall on the ski mountain. This moisture delayed the delivery of the casita/studio into April, as many of our roads in New Mexico’s state capital are basically dirt with a thin layering of gravel. Our new driveway for the casita also needed to “settle” with some spring rains and then to dry out.

This next photo shows the casita being transported to our location. It’s a wonderful wide-angle shot of I-25 going north toward Santa Fe.
